JANUARY ASSIGNMENT

A sestina form is our never mandatory, but always stimulating assignment for January.

THE STUDY & WRITING OF POETRY defines the sestina as follows:

a poetry form having six six-line stanzas ending with a tercet; the end words of the first stanza are repeated with progressively changed order in the other five stanzas, and are included, medially and finally, in the tercet; it is a fixed form and a skilled writer of form can make the reader unaware of the strict rules of the form.

1st stanza	1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6
2nd stanza	6, 1, 5, 2, 4, 3
3rd stanza	3, 6, 4, 1, 2, 5
4th stanza	5, 3, 2, 6, 1, 4
5th stanza	4, 5, 1, 3, 6, 2
6th stanza	2, 4, 6, 5, 3, 1

Anne Marx suggests:

Our concern is with the required order of end words. So-put down your own first stanza of six lines with your own chosen end words expressing your essential thought. This first stanza, its end words represented by the numbers 1--6 is followed by the second stanza, its end words represented by the numbers 6, 1, 5, 2, 4, 3. And this is the only sequence you need to understand and remember! The simple pattern evolves by reversing the order of the last three end words and inserting them on top and in the first two spaces between the original numbers. They will now occupy the former positions 1, 3 and 5. The original first three end words are automatically moved into new places and will now occupy original positions 2, 4 and 6. I think of this counter-movement as a kind of dance between two groups approaching each other, suggestive of the sestina's Provençal origin in the 13th century.

From THE STUDY...pages 167 and 168.

The sestina originated in France, it is an ancient unrhymed verse form. The original rules still apply in part, other rules have been modified in modern usage. One rule which stands is the characteristic six-stanza form, each of six lines of the same length, with a concluding three-line stanza.

An example by Anne Marx, from FACE LIFTS FOR ALL SEASONS, Golden Quill Press, 1980

SESTINA FOR TOMMY AT FORTY

Today you are the son I tried to raise,
a man moored firmly in his family,
tender yet strong; thoughtful yet undeterred-- you now at forty all I once foresaw
when I was forty in your spring-time years,
our rhythms uneven, needs too far apart.

At forty, I had not yet learned to part with my own past, relied on words to raise a teen-age son straight into adult years;
in retrospect, close-ups of family relationships you had, the love you saw,
sustained you later, instincts undeterred.

Forty years old, I was still undeterred from training you for life, a leading part that featured all the dormant gifts I saw in you. Was this my sole mistake to raise your goals too high? You blamed the family pride, stiff-necked, and shunned our world for years.

At last, you freed your view. Past fog-filled years
you found your path, followed it undeterred fulfilling every promise. Our family surrounding you with pride became a part of you, no longer needed now to raise your self-esteem, man that my vision saw.

Hard to convince, I never clearly saw the truth, a wisdom unacknowledged years ago that mothers are not fit to raise their teen-age sons. Boys should grow undeterred by women into manhood. As they depart, they find their way back to the family.

At forty, you have spread the family tree by three new branches. Changes we saw begin in ourselves were due in part to the diminished gap between our years.
As I observe you functioning undeterred,
what ghosts from my own forties should I raise?

you now raise girls, a strong-willed family.
Their view are undeterred by what you saw
and learned from years, a male, my counterpart.

NOVEMBER ASSIGNMENT

"Sonnets have ever spoken deep emotions of the heart with a sort of magic that touches the secret soul" so Guanetta Gordon begins her explanation of the sonnet in THE STYLE AND WRITING OF POETRY, AMERICAN WOMEN POETS DISCUSS THEIR CRAFT, edited by Wauneta Hackleman.

The sonnet is a fixed pattern of fourteen lines of iambic pentameter rhythm (unaccented (short) followed by an accented syllables--10 syllables to a line). The end word of each of the fourteen lines is a rhyme word.

The various types of sonnets have different rhyme patterns. For example, the Petrarchan rhyme scheme is abba, abba, cde, cde. The sestet (last six lines) may differ as : cd cd cd. The Shakespearean rhyme scheme typically consists of three quatrains and a couplet: abab, cdcd, efef, gg. The Beymorlin is Shakespearean or Petrarchan in end rhyme, and must also rhyme within the first two syllables of the beginning of the lines, with the same rhyme scheme (but not necessarily the same sound) as end lines.

Slight variations of the form in meter or rhyme are allowed, but to be a first rate sonnet, attention must be paid to the craft and above all, the poem must communicate! No rhymes for the sake of rhyme, avoid inversions (such as " a Christmas merry", done just to get the rhyme) avoid cliches.

GET WELL WISHES

Our very best to Edna Busekist, who is now recuperating at home after surgery. We hope she will be up and running circles around us --poetically speaking--by our next meeting. Get well, soon, Edna.

THANK YOU

A special thanks to Verna Larson who has volunteered to host the monthly readings at her home at Gus Johnson Plaza. Thank you for making the extra effort, Verna, on behalf of each of our members.

THE SONNET as a poetic form

The encyclopedia says a sonnet is a short poem, song, or ballad. Specifically, it is a short poem of prescribed form restricted to 14 lines arranged according to a fixed disposition.

The word came from the Italian "sonetto", probably derived from the Old French and Provencal "sonet" a diminutive of "son" which, in turn, was obtained from the Latin "sonus", a sound or musical air.

That the sonnet originated in Italy seems definitely settled, but the manner of its origin remains an object of discussion.

That is enough background. The encyclopedia goes on and on about how the form was finally set into two major patterns. It began to be used in the 13th century

Francesco Petrarca (Petrarch) firmly established the Petrarchan form with its "abba abba cde cde or cd cd, etc." It was then introduced to Spain, then to Portugal, France, Germany, and by the 16th century it had reached England.

In England, a modification of the form was used by Shakespeare. The Petrarchan was called the compound stanza, and the modification called the simple stanza. Rhyme scheme: ab ab ab ab ab ab cc.

I have not been able to find out when the rhyme scheme changed to the pattern we use today: abab cdcd efef gg

A sonnet may be written several ways. It may be written in one continuous poem. It may be separated so the first 8 lines, called the octave, are in one continuous poem, then the sestet, or last six line section is one continuous second part of the sonnet. Or a sonnet may be written as four quatrains ending with a couplet. In all cases the stanza is written in iambic pentameter and must be fourteen lines long.

The octave in the Petrarchan carries the burden of the theme, or the premise of the theme, and the sestet turns the theme around in some way to bring it to a conclusion, to resolve the issue, or at least present another point of view. The last line, or even the couplet may be a surprise ending. The Petrarchan form is quite rigid.

The most used form in English today is the Shakespearean.

Just a brief word about rhyme itself. True rhymes are when the words sound identical: hour, sour snow, chateau.

Notice, it is not the spelling but the sound that matters. Rhymes with one or more unaccented syllables after the last accent are called "feminine". Those which end on the accent are "masculine".

feminine: crisis, sleeping, morning
masculine: laws, applause, wings, night.

Near rhymes are acceptable also: heart, heat courage, engage etc.
Twentieth century poets use them more than former poets.
